

Top Level Website Strategic, UX, UI, Tech Audit

DGTAL

The homepage currently opens with:
“WE POWER YOUR PLAY” followed by:
“Cricketing gear for every level and style.”
Then:
“WE COVER ALL CRICKET”
and:
“Widest range of cricket gear.”

The Homepage reinforces this positioning by describing 22 Yards as a company “at the heart of cricket” and repeatedly talking about cricket gear/equipment.

But the navigation tells a completely different story.

Under Beyond Cricket, the site currently offers:

- | | | |
|----------------|------------|--------------|
| Chess | Badminton | Pickleball |
| Carrom | Basketball | Skating |
| Yoga & Fitness | Football | Table Tennis |
| Swimming | Tennis | Hockey |
| Apparel | Volleyball | |

And then there is another large Apparels taxonomy.

That's a strategic contradiction.

The hero proposition is weak
“WE POWER YOUR PLAY” is generic.

Almost any sports retailer could say it.
Then:
“Cricketing gear for every level and style. Start exploring...”

Again, that's functional ecommerce copy.

It needs to establish:

Why 22 Yards?

What makes us different?

Why trust us?

Why should I buy here rather than Amazon/Decathlon/local sports stores?

What does 22 Yards stand for?

The hero should do much more strategic work.

Also consistency is critical; the offers, promotions, deals etc that are being displayed across social media must be translated to the website as well.

The company is:

a sports company that happens to have strong cricket credentials.

The website currently says:

We are a cricket company that also sells some other sports products.

Those are completely different brand positions.

Recommendation

We need to decide what the master brand proposition is.

Something closer to:

22 Yards - Your World of Sport

or

22 Yards - Everything You Need to Play or something much more distinctive.

I'm not recommending those as final taglines yet. The positioning needs to be developed properly.

But the fundamental strategic decision has to be made:

Is 22 Yards:

A. A cricket specialist?

or

B. A multi-sport retailer?

or, potentially much more interestingly:

C. A sports ecosystem: products + experiences + communities + services?

“Beyond Cricket” is not giving the right positioning.

“Cricket is our real business. These are the other things we happen to sell.”

That's exactly the opposite of the broader business you want to build.

And it creates an unnecessary hierarchy:

Cricket = core

Everything else = secondary

If 22 Yards genuinely wants to become a sports brand, sports outside cricket shouldn't live under a linguistic “other” bucket.

The navigation is trying to organise products rather than help customers shop

The primary cricket navigation is:

Bat / Ball / Field / Wear / Play / Train

But then within those:

Bat → Cricket Bats, Helmets, Inner Gloves, Batting Gloves, Chest Guards, Elbow Guards...

and:

Play → Kit Bags, Combo Kits, Bat knocking, Cricket Stumps, Autograph Bats, Umpiring Gears..

This is an internal merchandising taxonomy, not necessarily a customer-first information architecture.

A customer doesn't necessarily think:

“I need something under PLAY.”

They think:

“I need cricket batting equipment.”

or:

“I'm starting cricket.”

or:

“My 10-year-old needs a complete kit.”

or:

“I need a new cricket bat.”

The IA should potentially be built around multiple ways of shopping:

SHOP BY SPORT

Cricket | Football | Badminton | Padel | Pickleball | etc.

SHOP BY PLAYER

Kids | Juniors | Adults | Beginners | Competitive

SHOP BY NEED

Complete Kits | Protection | Training | Footwear | Apparel

SHOP BY LEVEL

Beginner | Recreational | Competitive | Professional

That would be much more customer-centric.

BLOG

Discover Tips & Trends

If the Blog section isn't ready, do not expose an empty Blog section to customers.

Hide the Blog section completely from the navigation and homepage until its ready.

Too much emphasis on “products”, not enough on “people”

The site is heavily product/catalogue oriented.

But sport is inherently emotional.

People don't buy a cricket bat because they love cricket bats.

They buy it because:

They want to play better.

A parent buys a child's first cricket kit because:

Their kid wants to become a player.

Someone buys a football because:

They want to play with their friends.

Someone buys a padel racket because:

They're entering a new sport.

That emotional layer is largely absent.

The website needs much more:

PLAY | PASSION | PERFORMANCE | COMMUNITY | ASPIRATION

rather than:

PRODUCT → PRICE → BUY

DGTAL

Also, we must discuss about categorising the products as:-

“What Players Are Buying”

or:

“Complete Your Kit”

or:

“Most Loved by Beginners”

or:

“Under ₹5,000”

or:

“Match Day Essentials”

Those are customer missions, not merely product categories.

The site must sufficiently educate the customer

This is particularly important for cricket.

Buying a cricket bat is complicated.

Parents may not understand:

- English willow vs Kashmir willow
- Grade
- Weight
- Size
- Handle
- Profile
- Edge
- Sweet spot

The FAQ actually says that 22 Yards provides size guidance and buying guides for bats.

That should be much more prominent.

Instead of expecting customers to figure it out:

“Which bat is right for me?”

→ guided selector.

“Buying your first cricket bat?”

→ guide.

“What size bat does my child need?”

→ interactive tool.

That's where 22 Yards can begin behaving like an expert sports company, rather than another ecommerce catalogue.

There's a huge opportunity to make the website personalised

There is potential to create a much better journey.

Imagine arriving and being asked:

WHO ARE YOU SHOPPING FOR?

- * Myself
- * My child
- * My team
- * My academy

Then:

WHAT DO YOU PLAY?

Cricket | Football | Badminton | Padel | Pickleball...

Then:

WHAT LEVEL?

Beginner | Recreational | Competitive

Suddenly the site becomes a sports concierge.

Trust is being communicated too generically.

The site has:

- Free shipping
- Prompt support
- Easy returns
- Secure payments
- Reviews

Those are useful. But every ecommerce site says these things.

The stronger trust proposition is already sitting inside the business:

100% genuine products sourced from trusted manufacturers.

That's much more meaningful in sports equipment (something we spoke about).
Why?

Because counterfeit cricket equipment is a genuine customer concern.

So:

100% AUTHENTIC should become a major brand trust proposition, not just buried in the FAQ/About content.

India/USA specific issues observed:

1. Contact number doesn't change with the market

When India is selected, the Offers section still displays a USA telephone number.

The customer has explicitly selected India, so showing a US contact number creates confusion about which market they are actually dealing with.

2. USA-specific campaigns remain visible to Indian users

After switching to the India market, the site still displays references to:

- Halloween
- 4th July
- Other USA-specific promotional messaging

This makes the localisation feel superficial rather than genuinely market-specific.

3. Indian pricing/promotions appear in the USA experience

When the USA market is selected, the site still displays:

₹100 OFF on orders of ₹600

That's clearly an India-specific offer and should not appear in the US customer journey.

LEGEND LINEUP

Cricketers – Endorsed Product Lines

TILAK VARMA SERIES

Elegant timing. Fearless intent. Built for big moments.

SURYAKUMAR YADAV SKY SERIES

Fearless. 360° brilliance. Pure SKY magic.

MS DHONI THALA S

Silent power. Tactical pre-stroke.

Wastage of real estate

The marked area can be used to display more photos from the series and the title “Legend Lineup” could be placed above all the photos to optimize the utilisation of space

CUSTOMER REVIEWS

"22 Yards is one of the best cricket gear stores when it comes to reliability, competitive pricing, and fast service. They are consistently delivering excellent customer service satisfaction".

Venkateswara Bijjem | Cricket Player - All Rounder, Orlando, FL

Wastage of real estate

Similarly, too much space is being occupied here. The full width of the screen could be utilised more effectively, allowing 3-4 reviews to be displayed simultaneously.

BatBallFieldWearPlayTrainBeyond CricketApparels

From the main navigation, “Beyond Cricket” and “Apparels” are not clearly visible

If any product categories have zero products, mention something like a “coming soon” and most importantly, prompt the prospect/user to share their email so we can let the know when the product category is available. Exactly like we have a “Notify me” for out of stock products on 22Y website. Get that lead to out database and automate the process to send out a mailer when that product / product category becomes active.

There is enough space below the “tags” section, yet the items are getting cut. From good UX standpoint it will be better to utilise this space effectively and display the wider list of items.
